

Rainpocalypse

If your property has been damaged due to a heavy rain and high winds, it can be tricky to collect insurance benefits to pay for repairs.

Home and renters policies exclude some but not all types of water damage. “Flood” damage (the policy should define what the insurer considers a “flood”) and earth movement are excluded. Water damage from sewers and drains that back up may or may not be covered, depending on the wording in the specific home/renters policy. If wind or falling trees cause damage to pipes or contribute to water getting into a dwelling, there may be coverage under a home/renters policy.

Unless your property is located in an official flood zone, you probably don’t have flood insurance. Flood insurance policies cover damage from inundation and mudflow with a number of limitations and exclusions. For more information, visit our Claim Help Library.

After the storm:

- If your home was damaged, focus on creating a scope of everything that was damaged and what it will cost to repair or replace
- To keep a clean record and avoid premium increases, don't file a claim until you review your policy and you think your loss will exceed your deductible and be covered.
- If the damage was sudden and accidental and triggered by the storm, don't accept a claim denial argument from your insurer or agent that it was due to faulty construction or maintenance. The insurer cashed your premium checks and insured your property "as is".
- If you file a claim and your insurer rejects it, make sure you get a clear and detailed explanation of their position. Poke around our library for suggestions on Speaking UP. Claim and coverage disputes are rarely as clear cut as your insurer makes them out to be.
- The answer to whether your town or city will pay to repair flooding damage to your home is... "it depends."
