According to United Policyholders, a homeowner's policy covers falling and rain-driven water, so if the storm created any breaks in the house exterior — holes in the roof, broken windows, penetrated seals through which rain fell or through which wind drove rain inside — there is coverage through a homeowners policy. All flooding from rising water or river flooding is excluded unless a Flood Insurance Rider has been added to the policy by the homeowner. No exceptions.

For people who have no flood insurance but want to know if anything's covered in their home policy: Home policies should cover people's temporary living expenses due to being out of their homes under a mandatory evacuation order by a government entity. But that may require an argument to be made.

Company adjusters may initially say no and state the damage relates to flooding so it's excluded. Homeowners can respond to this information and stress that the evacuation order is the triggering cause of their loss of use. This homeowner's insurance coverage only lasts as long as the home is uninhabitable due to the evacuation order and it will not include repair costs.

For those who have flood insurance and want a basic understanding of what's covered visit our flood claim page for Colorado residents:

uphelp.org/blog. There are several presentations on the video including one by a representative from the National Flood Insurance Program plus a flood insurance agent based in Denver. Flood policies have limited coverage for example: basements are excluded) and there are lots of rules and conditions.
